Apple introduces Macintosh.
The computer for the bemused, confused and intimidated.

The first Apple you can carry in a bag.

We understand how you feel.

It's Catch-22. If you're busy enough to really benefit from a computer, you don't have the time to decipher the buzz words, jargon, claims and counter-claims of "Computer-Speak."

So you're left bemused, confused or intimidated by an information overload that seems to create problems instead of solving them.

So we decided, if computers are so smart, why don't we teach a computer how people work, instead of teaching people how computers work.

The result is Macintosh.' Macintosh is incredibly simple and easy to use. There are no complicated manuals. No command sequences. No computer languages.

Macintosh works just the way you do now. In about the same amount of space as an 8½ x 11 inch pad of paper. To understand how, forget computers. Imagine your desk. What do you see?

An In-and-Out tray. A calendar. Pens, paper, scissors, tape. Stacks of memos. Lists of things to do. A calculator. Drawers of files. And at the side, a trash can.

All of these objects are on Macintosh's screen. Just as they are on your desk.

Say, for example, you want a file. On other computers, you'd refer to a manual. Find a code. Type it on a keyboard. And wait. A slow, laborious process. Especially if you don't type.

With Macintosh, there is no typing. To open a file, you move a hand-held device on your desk, called a mouse.

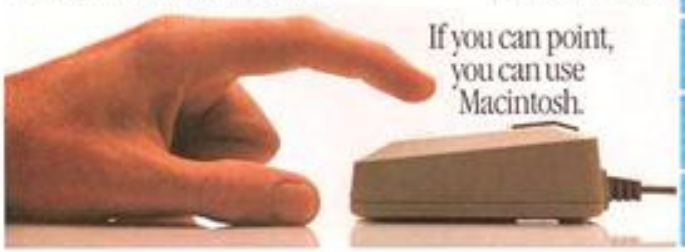
As you move the mouse, an arrow moves on the screen. Point the arrow to the file folder. Push the button on the mouse. And you're instantly working with that file.

Every other object on Macintosh's screen works the same way. Using the mouse, you can draw a chart. Cut it out. And paste it into the text of a memo. Just by pointing and clicking.

With software like MacWrite,' MacDraw,' MacPaint' and MacTerminal,' you work faster. More efficiently. And more creatively.

And there are hundreds more software programs on the way. Each on 3½ inch disks that let you carry file cabinets of information in your shirt pocket. Macintosh itself weighs only 20 pounds. Which means you can literally carry your whole office home with you.

And to carry you through the largest workloads, is Macintosh's 32-bit microprocessor.



If you can point, you can use Macintosh.

With twice the power of any 16-bit computer.

And because Macintosh is an Apple 32-bit SuperMicro,' it can work as a part of an integrated system with other Macintoshes, Lisas' and peripherals. It can also communicate with DEC® and IBM® mainframes.

See Macintosh at your Apple dealer today.

While it may amaze you, Macintosh certainly won't bemuse, confuse or intimidate you.

And neither will the price.

Macintosh's Personality.

THE SERIOUS SIDE.

THE FUN SIDE.

Soon there'll be just two kinds of people. Those who use computers and those who use Apples.
